

Foreign Phrases.
The ridiculous custom of interlarding articles with foreign words is ridiculed by the Common School Journal. For our part, when we hear a preacher talk much in his sermon about the original Greek or Hebrew, or see an editor drag in French and Latin on every occasion, we at once set the man down as labouring under the double affliction of ignorance and vanity. With such persons a medley or mixture is a mélange; a fray is nothing short of a mélange, and the select are not the chosen but the élite. The disputants do not differ entirely, but de cado; and they never begin again, but de novo, or, as some goons prefer to say, ad ova. The common items of news are interlarded with such barbarisms. Thus the President is never going to Washington, but he is en route for the city. No remark can now be made by the way or in passing, but it must be en passant. A rising of the people is no longer a mob or a rebellion but an émeute. Some years ago, an editor observed that nous terrons was a more expressive phrase than we shall see, and now every village editor, after giving his views of national affairs, gathers himself up in his arm chair, and utters the doubtful prophecy, "nous terrons."

A Clever Hit.
We learn from a Parisian correspondent of the Tribune that a clever sarcasm upon legislative legislators has been lately put forth in Paris. It is a caricature, in which two chimney sweeps are represented fighting outside the Chamber of Deputies. A policeman interposes, saying: "No fighting in the streets, you blackguards! Go inside the Chamber, if you wish to do that."—Satan's Rep.
